the besich.

Mrs. Smith entered, escorted by Mr. Wells one of her counsel, and Deputy Sergeant Marth.

She was dressed entirely in black, from her well made hat to the low quartered shoes that she wore. Black gloves covered her hands, and a short but heavy black vell concealed her features. She shook hands with Mr. H. M. Smith, her senlor counsel, and took a chair just behind his seat.

Like an inanimate thing she sat, with never a movement of hand or foot. Not a word did she say to friend er foe, and seeningly what went on around her was to ner of no moment. The opening of the trial was marked, as predicted by The Times-Dispatch of yesterday, by two separate occurrences—first, the striving of counsel for the defense to seeme a continuance on the ground that the continuance on the ground that the continuance on the ground that the continuance of the medical profession from making an examination of the prisoner for her benefit, and, second, the unsuccessful attempt of the court to score a jury from Manchester venires.

Almost before the sound of Sergeant Saunders's voice had died away as he opened court, Mr. H. M. Smith, of counsel for the defense, was upon his feet, nating for a continuance. The motion was denied and Attorneys H. M. Smith and E. H. Wells filed exceptions to Judge Clopton's ruling, as follows:

Be it further remembered that, on this, the 27th day of June, 1905, the day fixed for the trial of said felony case, H. M. Smith, Jr., and E. H. Wells, attorneys at law, counsel for said sprisoner, moved the court for a continuance of said case upon the ground that they had been prevented from properly preparing their defense by the action of the said court as set out in the above correspondence, and the said H. Mrs. Smith arose and came to the front of the bar. Leaning both hands on the railing, with the veil still covering her face, she stood without a tremor for six long minutes, while Clerk DuVal read the paper, which described in all its rowful, hiddedus details the death of Ralph Smith. Not a bruise or a blow was left unsaid, not a loophole was left in the strong net of the law spread out to ensure the guilty.
